

10)

The Articles of Confederation (1777) established a “league of friendship” for the 13 sovereign and independent states. Each state retained significant power, while the central government did not have the power to tax.

After much debate, the Articles were revised into the new U.S. Constitution, which granted much more power to the federal, or central, government. The ability to tax and regulate trade now fell under the authority of the federal government.

What is an assumption behind the U.S. Constitution that is not one behind the Articles of Confederation?

- A. Cooperation between states should be limited.
- B. The power of independent states is most important.
- C. Power should be given to the federal government.
- D. National concerns will be solved by state sovereignty.
