Chapter 4 Labor and Financial Markets

4.1 Demand and Supply at Work in Labor Markets

Markets for labor have demand and supply curves, just like markets for goods.

Law of demand: Higher wages (price) leads to higher in quantity of labor demanded by employers.
Lower wages (price) leads to lower in quantity of labor demanded

At equilibrium, the quantity supplied and quantity demanded are equal.

Make sure you understand the book example: Demand and Supply for Nurses in Minneapolis-St. Paul

At an above-equilibrium salary of $75,000:
quantity supplied increases to 38,000
but the quantity demanded declines to 33,000.
At this above-equilibrium salary, an excess supply or surplus of nurses would exist.

Factors that can shift demand for Labor

- Demand for labor: If a producer needs to make more product they hire more people.
- Education and government policies: A well-trained workforce increases the demand for employees
- Technology: Technology may serve as a substitute for labor. If technology replaces a worker, the demand for workers will decrease resulting in a shift to the left.
- Number of Companies: If the number of companies making a product increases, there will be an higher demand for labor resulting in a shift to the right.
- Government Regulations: To comply with regulations, and employer may need to hire more workers resulting in a shift to the right.
- Price and Availability of other inputs: Other than labor, if prices of other inputs falls, suppliers will demand more labor resulting in a shift to the right.

minimum wage: a price floor that makes it illegal for an employer to pay employees less than a certain hourly rate
