Abstract: Objective: The current review sought to synthesise and evaluate ADHD guidelines to identify recommended procedures for co-occurring and differential diagnosis for ADHD assessments of school aged children. Method: A systematic literature review was conducted by searching PsycInfo, Medline, CINAHL and Web of Science. A grey literature search was also performed. ADHD guidelines that described a diagnostic process for school aged children, published between 2013 and 2021, by Government organisations or a national professional association, and written in English were included. Results: Each of the six included guidelines were produced by panels consisting primarily of paediatricians and psychiatrists. All guidelines recommended assessing for co-occurring conditions. Five of the guidelines recommended consideration of a differential diagnosis. Five guidelines also recommended referral to a specialist, mental health clinician or psychologist when diagnostic uncertainty exists. Conclusions: Guidelines to assist in the assessment of referred cases were not discovered. There is a need for recommendations to be developed to supplement existing guidelines to aid psychologists and mental health clinicians in a systematic ADHD assessment process, particularly in complex cases.

Keywords: ADHD; children; assessment; co-occurring diagnoses; differential diagnosis

1. Introduction

Attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD) is one of the most frequently occurring neurodevelopmental disorders worldwide [1]. Clinical practice guidelines can aid the assessment process; however, concerns regarding inadequate assessment of potential co-occurring and differential conditions are common [2]. Misdiagnosis may result in associated risks and side effects if pharmaceuticals are administered incorrectly [3], while underdiagnosis results in children not receiving needed support [4] and in potentially lost social and educational opportunities [5]. Given concerns regarding adequacy of assessments, as well as the consequences of both misdiagnosis and underdiagnosis, the current review sought to synthesise and evaluate ADHD guidelines to identify recommended procedures for co-occurring and differential diagnosis for ADHD assessments of school aged children.

ADHD is a neurodevelopmental disorder described as “a persistent pattern of inattention and/or hyperactivity-impulsivity that interferes with functioning or development” [6] (Attention-Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder section, paragraph 1). The aetiology of ADHD is primarily grounded in genetic and neurological factors which may be influenced by interactions in the environment such as infections or exposure to toxins [7]. Children with ADHD may experience challenges inhibiting inappropriate behaviour, refocusing attention, implementing goal directed behaviour, and regulating emotions such as anger, impatience and frustration [7]. Consequently, they may experience an increased incidence of adverse outcomes such as relationship problems [8], sleep disturbances [9],
