

The vertebrate brain

- The vertebrate brain is the main part of the central nervous system. The brain and the spinal cord make up the central nervous system,
- In most of the vertebrates the brain is at the front, in the head. It is protected by the skull and close to the main sense organs.
- Brains are extremely complex and the part of human and animal body. The brain controls the other organs of the body, either by activating muscles or by causing secretion of chemicals such as hormones and neurotransmitters.
- Muscular action allows rapid and coordinated responses to changes in the environment.
- The brain of an adult human weights about 1300–1400 grams .
- In vertebrates, the spinal cord by itself can cause reflex responses as well as simple movement such as swimming or walking. However, sophisticated control of behaviour requires a centralized brain.
- The structure of all vertebrate brains is basically the same.
- At the same time, during the course of evolution, the vertebrate brain has undergone changes, and become more effective.
- In so-called 'lower' animals, most or all of the brain structure is inherited, and therefore their behaviour is mostly instinctive.
- In mammals, and especially in man, the brain is developed further during life by learning. This has the benefit of helping them fit better into their environment. The capacity to learn is seen best in the cerebral cortex.
