Residents of long-term care facilities are generally of older age, and age is an important osteoporosis risk factor. Previous reports suggest that the prevalence of diagnosed osteoporosis ranges from 6.2% to 12.5% among long-term care residents in the United States although the true prevalence may be higher because of underutilization of osteoporosis screening and treatment in this setting.<sup>4-6</sup> Even after osteoporosis has been diagnosed, relatively few (25%) of the affected residents receive osteoporosis treatment.<sup>4-6</sup> Treatment includes regular weight-bearing, muscle-strengthening exercises and pharmacologic therapy.<sup>11</sup> Undertreatment of osteoporosis, elevated risk of falls, previous fractures and advanced age all increase the risk that a long-term care resident will experience an osteoporosis-related fracture. The literature suggests that 6% to 11% of long-term care residents will experience a fracture during a 1-year to 3-year interval.<sup>4,7-12</sup> Mortality risk may be impacted with up to 42% of affected long-term care residents dying within 2 years after a fracture.<sup>4,12,13-20</sup>

METHODS

Data collection was conducted sequentially at each of the 11 study sites between April 1, 2012 and August 31, 2013. This sample represents 11% of the long-term care facilities in the New Orleans Metro area, covered by the 504 area code.<sup>29</sup>
