Continuities of Deprivation: The Newcastle 1000 Family Study. By I. Kolvin, F. J. W. Miller, D. McL. Scott, S. R. M. Gatzanis and M. Fleeting. (Pp. 408; £38.50.) Avebury: Aldershot, Hants. 1990.

This is an important book. It is the fifteenth volume in the series of studies in deprivation and disadvantage sponsored by the ESRC and DHSS. It reports findings from the Newcastle 1000 Family Study which commenced in 1947 with recruitment of all children born in the months of May and June of that year. There have been many previous reports from this study and this book brings together follow-up data gathered between 1979 and 1981 in the light of earlier data obtained on the children and their families in the 1950s. The 847 families remaining in the longitudinal study in 1952 form the base population of the present study which comprised three main elements. First, there was information from stratified samples based on 1952 criteria of deprivation: deprived, non-deprived and multi-deprived. This included data on the families formed by the index subjects born in 1947, since the vast majority are now married: and retrospective data on the spouses of the subjects.

Secondly, there was detailed information on contact with the law for all subjects and finally, third-generation information on the children of the index children. Most information was obtained from interviews with the families but there are also school data on the third-generation children, assessments of their behaviour at home and their temperament. Psychometric testing was performed with the original index children as adults, their spouses, and the third-generation children. This comprises a very large body of data some of which have been reported in a number of other places.

The book is important because it brings together data, analysis and theorizing concerning one of the most significant longitudinal studies conducted in the United Kingdom since the Second World War. Although much of the original focus of the study in the 1950s was on the children's physical health, there was nevertheless a considerable amount of information on child rearing and social factors which means that a follow-up study of the children as parents is particularly valuable. Professor Kolvin, Dr Miller and their colleagues are to be congratulated on making use of this opportunity.

Given the size of the study and the complexity of the analysis involved, it is clear that many decisions had to be made about the inclusion and exclusion of a variety of details, and some of the tables referred to are not available in the book but directly from the authors. For example, there was evidently a decision to put into the book much of the basic data while reporting more complex analyses in summary form. This seems a reasonable decision, but there is no doubt that the complex analyses will need to be subjected to more detailed consideration. Although every attempt has been made to indicate what data are being referred to, there are nevertheless a number of occasions when the reader must concentrate hard in order to understand what variables are being referred to and at what time in the index children's development they were assessed. The summary diagrams and tables for the more complex analyses may also be criticized on the ground that simplicity has not always led to clarity. There are necessary limitations in a study of this sort because of the nature and quality of the data which have been collected over a considerable period, and the authors are well aware of this. One example is the different criteria applied to deprivation when the children were 5 and at age 33.

The overall approach of the book is to proceed from description of data to inferences and further hypotheses. Although the style of writing is fluent and easy, there are times when the material is somewhat indigestible and it can be argued that laying out the results in accordance with strong theoretical models would have been preferable. Theoretical models have had to be
