

The Social/Moral Basis of Occupational Life: Teacher Education in the Soviet Union

Thomas S. Popkewitz

University of Wisconsin-Madison

The Soviet Union Educational system has undergone certain major curriculum reforms since the mid-1960s. These reforms have been necessitated by the changing industrial character of the Soviet Union, which requires a scientific-technically educated population. As in the United States, where the curriculum reform movements in the last 20 years have focused upon science, mathematics and technology, the Soviet pedagogical community has undergone a "structure of the discipline" debate to provide a theoretical, conceptual base to school curriculum (see Note 1). The curriculum reorganization has been accompanied by the development of new instructional theories that are to provide strategies for teaching the new content (see Note 2 & Davis et al., 1979). This includes greater discussion of teaching to emphasize problem-solving, "self-education" and conceptual understanding (see Note 3).

The school reforms were coupled with other philosophical and social commitments that underlie the role of the school in a socialist society. The mandate of the Soviet school is to form a socialist world view among the young. To accomplish this purpose, Soviet pedagogies have applied the social philosophy of Marx and Lenin, dialectical materialism, to the development and implementation of curriculum. This social philosophy focuses upon the social and historical basis of personality, thought and learning. Relating social philosophy to science links social and psychological dimensions of instruction in a way that gives an interdisciplinary integration and coherence. Resulting pedagogical theories are optimistic about the ability of teachers to create the conditions for the learning demanded by the state curriculum. Further, Soviet pedagogical thought gives some attention to preparing children to be producers of culture as well as reproducing the given culture, a sharp contrast to the prior curriculum emphasis on rote learning.

The reform efforts in the Soviet schools have implications for the processes of teacher education. The new teaching strategies and content were incorporated into the designs of existing teacher education institutes. This essay will focus upon some directions that the reforms in higher education have taken. The concern is with the pedagogical theory that underlies current teacher education and how these theories relate to state priorities and the social/psychological assumptions of Soviet schooling. The account is based, in part, upon my experiences as a Fulbright lecturer in Soviet institutes of teacher education in the spring of 1981. The discussion of Soviet teacher education has, I believe, some comparative elements for consideration in American teacher education.

The discussion will proceed in the following manner. Certain formal organizational characteristics of Soviet teacher education are considered. This is followed by a discussion of the social philosophy of the state, dialectical materialism, to identify certain underlying assumptions in pedagogy and teacher education. These assumptions of social philosophy are also related to two focal points in the training of teachers: the role of the teacher in character formation or upbringing and the teaching of scientific-technological knowledge.

There is a comparative argument to this essay. It is two-fold: first, understanding teacher education involves identifying and illuminating how social/cultural and philosophical assumptions of the larger society are incorporated in and give direction to the problems of teaching and teacher education; second, the attention given to the relation between the social world and the individual in Soviet pedagogical theory provides, at one level, an alternative to the reductionism and fragmentation found in much of the behavioral and managerial research of American pedagogical research.

The Organization of Teacher Education

As in most European and non-European nations, the conduct of schooling is directed through a central ministry, the USSR Ministry of Education, located in Moscow. (Its direct translation is Ministry of Enlightenment.) The Ministry is concerned with the development, implementation, and evaluation of the national aspects of the curriculum, such as the teaching of science, the Russian language, and political education. Each of the 15 Republics that comprise the Soviet Union has a Ministry that gives attention to the conduct of schools, especially in the teaching of 150 indigenous languages, national cultures, and history.

The USSR Ministry of Education is responsible for most teacher education. This occurs in pedagogical schools (three year schools for teachers of primary education); pedagogical institutes (for teachers of the years 4-10 of education, involving children from ages 10-16); and institutes for inservice education. The Ministry also has a special Academy of Pedagogical Science which serves as the central pedagogical scientific group. The Academy's institute for Adult Education, located in Leningrad, gives attention to research in teacher education. Teacher education also occurs within the university, although the pedagogical departments are not emphasized and the university itself is administered by the Ministry of Higher Education.
