

An Experimental Approach to Dreams and Telepathy: II. Report of Three Studies

BY MONTAGUE ULLMAN, M.D., AND STANLEY KRIPPNER, PH.D.

Three studies were designed to investigate telepathic effects in REM sleep. On each night a target (art print) was randomly selected by an agent who spent the night in a distant room attempting to telepathically influence the subject's dreams, which were monitored by EEG techniques and tape recorded. Typed transcripts were sent to outside judges for blind comparisons with the targets. For each study, the ratings given the actual target-transcript combinations were significantly higher than those given the incorrect target-transcript combinations.

INTEREST in the possible occurrence of telepathy in dreams moved from an anecdotal level (spontaneous reports of dreams purporting to depict actual events simultaneously occurring unknown to and at a distance from the dreamer) to a clinical level when reports of presumptively telepathic dreams of patients occurring in the context of the therapeutic situation began to appear in the psychiatric literature. This began in Freud's own writings and has clustered in publications appearing in the past two decades(3).

With the development of electrophysiological techniques for monitoring of dreaming during the total period of sleep it became possible for the first time to engage in a dream study in a way that freed the experimenter from a precarious reliance upon spontaneous recall. In its application to the study of the telepathic dream it became possible for the first time to transcend the limitations of the clinical approach and to introduce into the experimental design a number of factors. These included quantification—i.e., having a designated number of subjects spend a certain number of nights in the laboratory; control of variables relating to the type of target material one is trying to "send"; specification of the conditions under which the "sending" occurs—i.e., isolating the "sender" or agent from the subject; and random selection of the target picture. It was also possible to have independent judging—i.e., having outside judges who know nothing about the order in which the target pictures are chosen for a series of experimental nights attempt to both rank and rate their judgments as to which target comes closest to the material described in the transcribed record of the subject's dreams for a given night. Finally, appropriate statistical techniques for evaluating the results of the judging process were developed.

Following an earlier report(3) describing exploratory studies utilizing the application of the REM monitoring technique to the study of the telepathic dream, our laboratory has engaged in a number of follow-up studies involving repeated nights with a selected subject. Three of these studies will be summarized.

First Study

The first experimental series to utilize a single subject was completed in 1964. The subject, a New York psychologist selected on the basis of his performance in a preliminary screening study, was paired with a staff psychologist working in the laboratory. The main hypothetical formulation
