

ARCTIC INTERLUDE

ERIC FRY

Engineer, Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, Ottawa.

Scattered throughout the Queen Elizabeth group of islands in the Canadian Arctic Archipelago, many cairns containing messages left by the early explorers sailing their wooden ships doubtless still remain undiscovered and untouched. One by one they will come to light through future decades, as activity pushes more rapidly into the far north. Now and again, it is hoped, vital records may turn up solving for all time the present unsolved riddles of vanished exploration parties. Other messages, not so vital in themselves, may yet help to piece together missing parts of uncompleted stories.

To most scientists travelling in the far north, these ancient records hold a fascination which however cannot be greatly indulged. The season in which to carry out the main mission of their journey is all too short, and transportation available to them far too precious, to be used up following the will-o'-the-wisp of cairn exploring, however personally intriguing the latter activity may be.

The writer, while attached to United States Navy vessels re-supplying the Arctic Weather Stations, has always hoarded his available flying time jealously for priority projects. Celestial observations for latitude and longitude along the route of travel comes high in importance on the list of activities, with airlift from ship to shore by helicopter the only means of transport while in heavy pack ice. Helicopters, vulnerable enough in themselves, are the eyes of an icebreaker while searching for leads through the pack, where their operation in fog and other hazards is always a potential source of trouble. Any other project entailing flying has of necessity to rate secondary to that of the main operation of the ship, and is closely evaluated before being authorized.

On August 4th last the United States Coast Guard icebreaker Eastwind was carrying out oceanographic studies in Smith Sound, to the north of Thule, in the vicinity of latitude 78°20' north. Skies being clear for observing, it was arranged that the ship would set me ashore on Cape Isabella, on the west side of Smith Sound, and leave me for a minimum of four hours, during which time the Eastwind would steam over to the Greenland side, to carry out soundings at the entrance to Etah fiord.

Going over details with the ship's commanding officer, Captain George Bowerman, I indicated my intention of having the helicopter set me down on one or other of two low points of land close to tidewater, my axiom for northern operations always being "keep it as simple as possible". "Oh" said the captain, "why not have the aircraft put you right up on top of the cliff, where you can have a good look around." I still demurred against this suggestion—it really wasn't necessary, possibility of sudden fog coming in, and all that sort of thing. The captain, however, was adamant in his conviction that I would be much better off up on top, and insisted that I have the pilot put me up there.

In due course the 'copter delivered me, complete with all surveying paraphernalia, on top of Cape Isabella. It was really lovely up there. Etah Fiord, though twenty miles distant across the sound, did not appear more than six miles away, and while setting up my instrument I watched the ship winding its way through the loose pack toward the Greenland coast. There was an intriguing looking cairn perched right on top of another cliff, across a deep ravine between it and my station, but I had time to give it no more than
