

Juan Manuel de Rosas
Argentine Caudillo
Governor of Buenos Aires (1829-1852)

•Caudillo: Strong-man leader common throughout Latin America in the 19th century in the years following independence. Often caudillos were national leaders (presidents or otherwise) but some were merely local leaders who wielded great influence. In many areas of Latin America, the instability caused by the power void after independence explains the rise and popularity of caudillos. Generally these leaders possessed the following characteristics:

- Capable military leaders: Most gained legitimacy as military men through their participation in the Wars of Independence (1810-20)
- Wealthy: Generally caudillos were independently wealthy (often tied to large landholdings) and were able to finance their own private armies.
- Ruthless: Caudillos were renowned for their indiscriminate use of terror and intimidation to maintain power.
- Charismatic: Caudillos were known to be extremely charming and charismatic. This personality trait provided them a large degree of popular support.
- Ready and reliable: Caudillos were reputed to possess the characteristics of "Machismo" and were known for their bravery, physical abilities, and masculinity.
