

World War II of the disastrous Garden City movement for military strategists, fearful of aerial bombardment, probably influenced the adoption of the New Towns program. In 1946 more than 15 million people were generally misled. But those large-scale housing projects that have been contemplated are in many cases woefully inadequate: the functionalist theory that is the usual basis for their design has obviously failed to express the social and individual needs of the occupants, with disastrous results. This has prompted the author to investigate the attitudes of architects to mass housing and evaluate concepts of utility, systemization, and changes in life style as the bases of a solution to the present housing crisis.
