

The impact of the COVID-19 pandemic on addictive disorders—an update

Overall, the early phases of the pandemic were not associated with more consumption of opioids, alcohol, cannabis and involvement in gambling, but there has been evidence for an increase in addictive behaviours among specific groups. Tobacco use stands somewhat apart with evidence of both increased quitting and more initiation. Natural experiments and other longitudinal research studies are needed to estimate lasting change.

INTRODUCTION

More than 2 years ago, several of us voiced concern that the COVID-19 pandemic and its associated public health prevention and control measures would be likely to affect disproportionately people with addictive disorders [1]. The scope of research that followed was mainly restricted to higher-income countries, but its volume has been astonishing. COVID-19 will continue to cast a long shadow, but we judged it timely to revisit the question of its impact on addictive disorders and summarize what happened.

OPIOIDS

Latest drug seizure data reports suggest that the supply of illicit opioids remained stable with some short-term localized disruptions [2], and surveys of people who use opioids have reported that consumption patterns generally have not been affected [3]. Administrative data on opioid use disorder (OUD) treatment showed a decline in service use after the pandemic restrictions, with the rate of new treatment admissions increasing after removal of these measures but below pre-pandemic levels [4, 5]. Nevertheless, there is evidence that people with OUD have had higher rates of COVID-19 infection and worsened health outcomes [6]. Hospital cases of opioid overdose increased during March–October 2020 [7], and fatal opioid and other drug poisonings have increased for the year [8].

Pragmatic and rapidly instituted changes to OUD treatment and related services, including dispensing of opioid agonist medications for up to 14 days for self-administration [9], the adoption or expansion of telehealth delivery [10] and practice changes by syringe service programmes [11] appear to have been successful and well received by service users [12] with minimal evidence of service interruption [13] and with no concerns for an increase in opioid-related overdose [13, 14].

ALCOHOL

Following the closure of bars and restaurants, in the United States retail alcohol sales increased significantly [15], and in Canada there was evidence of stockpiling during the first 16 months of the pandemic [16]. Overall, there does not seem to be evidence for an overall increase in alcohol consumption: a meta-analysis of 128 studies from 58 countries reported that an equal proportion of participants (23%) reported drinking more or drinking less [17]. However, during 2019–20, alcohol-specific mortality increased by 19 and 26% in the United Kingdom and United States, respectively [18, 19]. This increase may reflect a general reduction in access to health-care services and an increase in consumption in higher-risk groups [20]. Restrictions on the availability of alcohol might have been expected to reduce interpersonal violence and public order offences, but findings to date indicate that, irrespective of any changes in overall alcohol-attributable violence, domestic violence increased [21].

CANNABIS

Research has painted a mixed picture of the impact of the pandemic on cannabis use [see Chong and colleagues for a scoping review [22]]. In Canada, a time-series analysis of the legal sale of cannabis concluded that there was a continuation of the same rate of increase in sales that had been evident before the pandemic [23]. Cohort studies of adolescents and young adults that compared self-reported cannabis use in survey waves conducted before and during the pandemic reported very little change in consumption patterns [24, 25]. However, a different picture was observed in opportunistic surveys of people who use cannabis regularly. Here, the frequency and quantity of cannabis use increased during lockdowns and other social distancing restrictions [26–29].
