

Dimensions of Adolescent Alienation

James Mackey and Andrew Ahlgren
University of Minnesota

A review of the psychological, sociological and educational literature indicated that the various conceptualizations of "alienation" could be fitted into five tentative categories appearing to have considerable overlap. An item pool developed to represent these categories of alienation was screened by expert review and pilot testing in the 9th grade and then administered to 500 "normal" adolescents in 9th-grade classes in four diverse communities in Minnesota: a rural area, a suburban area, and working class and inner city areas of a large city. Factor analysis identified three coherent dimensions in student responses, which were labeled "Personal Incapacity," "Cultural Estrangement," and "Guilelessness." Simple cluster scores constructed to represent these dimensions had internal-consistency reliabilities of .80, .70, and .67 respectively. Patterns of significant differences shown by analyses of variance among groups defined by community type, socio-economic status, ability, and sex, compared well with hypothesized patterns; the few exceptions were tenable. The scales provide concrete measures of alienation that may enable more meaningful investigation of its incidence, correlates, and causes.

"Alienation" is one of the most frequently encountered concepts in social science. Indeed, the amorphous, global concept of alienation has been used as a catchword to explain nearly every kind of aberrant behavior from drug abuse to political demonstrations. Although many scholars have discussed constructs that can be loosely grouped as alienation, few have attempted to measure it. Clark (1959), Gansson (1961), and Horton and Thompson (1962) defined alienation as a feeling of powerlessness. Nettler (1957) and Keniston (1965) conceptualized alienation as a feeling of estrangement from American society and culture. In an attempt at synthesis, Olsen (1969) subsumed all the descriptions of alienation under three dimensions: social isolation, normlessness, and powerlessness.

The work of these investigators, proceeding for the most part independently, has focused on adults and given little explicit consideration to adolescents. Three major methodological problems limit the utility of the extant scales for use with adolescents in contemporary American society. First, the available scales often were validated with limited and atypical populations. For example, Clark's (1959) scale was developed for and used only on members of an agricultural co-operative. Dean's (1961) widely used scale was validated with an adult sample in Ohio.

A second weakness with available alienation scales is their lack of control for a response set to agree (or disagree) with almost all statements.
