Various technologies and innovations enable constant development and improvement within the medical sphere. As a result, healthcare professionals utilize sophisticated treatment or diagnostics interventions, while patients benefit from the higher productivity and efficiency of new methods. The use of stem cells is a promising approach because it can cope with treating diabetes and Parkinson's disease as well as understanding genetic illness. Even though stem cells can help address the health conditions that were recently considered incurable, this method is not widely accepted. The rationale behind this statement is that stem cell-based therapy is associated with a few significant ethical challenges that can outweigh all the potential benefits. Thus, the analysis of scholarly articles demonstrates that the leading ethical concerns include the destruction of a human embryo, an increased probability of tumor growth and metastasis, and the creation of genetically engineered human embryos.

Firstly, the leading argument against the use of stem cell-based therapy is the fact that it leads to the destruction of a human embryo. The intervention under analysis implies removing embryonic stem cells (ESCs) from human embryos and subjecting them to particular manipulations (Zakrzewski et al., 2019). This approach allows for achieving the significant benefits that have been presented above. However, an important issue is associated with the fact that the isolation of ESCs makes the embryo destroyed, and the essential aspect is that this embryo could have become a human under particular conditions (Zakrzewski et al., 2019). Even though a patient does not suffer any immediate or physical harm, the intervention implies potentially negative consequences for the organism's future. That is why many scientists join a discussion regarding whether it is ethical to rely on the selected therapy.

Secondly, stem cell-based therapy can result in more immediate problems. For example, the application of mesenchymal stem cells (MSCs) can lead to tumor growth and metastasis development (Volarevic et al., 2018). These harmful outcomes are attributed to "unwanted differentiation of the transplanted MSCs and their potential to suppress anti-tumor immune response and generate new blood vessels" (Volarevic et al., 2018). It is worth admitting that these health problems can emerge as side-effects of effective treatment of autoimmune and chronic inflammatory diseases (Volarevic et al.,
