Francisco Coronado

Spanish explorer de Coronado was born in Spain around the year 1498. He represented the Spanish crown as a conquistador in North America.

When Coronado arrived in New Spain, which is now Mexico in 1540, his fellow explorers and soldiers recognized him for bringing peace to their relationship with the indigenous population. He won the love of Native Indians and began his journey north looking for riches.

A precious metal had reported often made of gold and Coronado wanted to find them and become rich quickly. Coronado and about three hundred other Spaniards along with enslaved Native Americans set out with horses and weapons to find the cities of gold. They first traveled west to the Gulf of California and then north into what is now the United States.

The exploration group traveled throughout the lands where he suffered in search of gold but they did not find them. They did however discover many indigenous groups who they taught how to farm from them through gifts of wheat, beans, tomatoes, and corn.

Before returning to Mexico, Coronado met many Native Americans and some were captured by Native Americans and some returned the golden with. Once he returned to Mexico, in 1542, Coronado reported to the king of Spain that he had found the cities of gold. He had traveled west to the Gulf of California and then north into what is now the United States.

While Coronado did not find the cities of gold, he did leave behind a journal full of descriptions of the regions he traveled through that encouraged later exploration.
