G. Saavedra^{1,2} and W. Spoor²

¹Instituto de Investigaciones Agropecuarias, CRI La Platina, Santiago, Chile; ²Scottish Agricultural College, The King's Buildings, Agriculture Building, Edinburgh, UK

Introduction

In most crop species, exploited populations have been reduced dramatically as a result of domestication and subsequent breeding/selection processes. The lower overall genetic diversity of modern cultivars of autogamous species may also reflect the genetic 'bottlenecks' to which these species have been subject either due to natural phenomenon such as polyploidy, mating and dispersion systems, and geographical barriers, or during their introduction to new regions from the centre of origin. Only a limited number of seeds/propagules (or accessions) were carried back by explorers, which serve as the basis of today's modern cultivars. In addition, many genotypes have been lost as a result of the replacement and disappearance of old varieties and landraces by new, more productive, modern varieties. These modern replacement varieties are apparently better adapted to biotic and abiotic stresses of these localities. Later, commonly used breeding techniques such as backcrosses and recurrent backcrosses to an existing top-variety were effective in terms of producing new varieties with highly prescribed characteristics, but this has been obtained at the further expense of genetic diversity (Simpson, 1979; Rick, 1987; Miller and Tanksley, 1990).

Since the development of scientific breeding, exploitation of the available genetic diversity has been poor; for years plant breeders have confined their programmes to a relatively small part of the overall genetic resource. However, over a similar time frame, a large amount of germplasm such as wild relatives, old varieties, landraces, and other breeding material has been stored in genebanks; this is a valuable, but relatively unexploited, source of genetic variability. Only a small amount of this variability has been introgressed to crop species, usually aiming to solve a specific problem (frequently disease resistance) involving a few genes.

Genetic base broadening is one approach which has been suggested as a means of providing a viable sustainable genetic base from which varieties can be selected either directly or following hybridization with the existing and currently exploited genetic base of a crop species. Genetic base broadening has been defined as 'composite crosses' (Sørensen, 1956), 'incorporation' (Simmonds, 1993) and 're-synthesis' (Becker et al., 1995). However, regardless of the term used, the definition per se has been the same. Genetic base broadening is the incorporation and re-synthesis of populations from wild relatives, landraces and/or old varieties into relatively new varieties or accessions. Strictly, base broadening should be without preconceived aims, partly because we do not know what is required in the future, and partly because such aims may influence the construction of the initial populations.
