

The Summary of:
Broadcasting the Blues: Black Blues in the Segregation Era

Author: Paul Oliver

Published in 2006 by Routledge Taylor and Francis Group

Broadcasting means more than just getting airtime on the radio; it also means getting the word out there about the people and the music. It's not difficult to imagine how hard it was for black people to get their music out to a wider audience during the segregation era in the States, especially in the South. Oh sure, there were the jazz clubs in some cities, but that was only for a small minority of audience, music, and musicians.

Besides, that's not the music we're talking about here. Jazz had been given a veneer of acceptability due to the many mainstream white acts that were incorporating elements of it into popular music; the big band sound of the forties and the crooners like Frank Sinatra. All of their music and arrangements were lifted from jazz.

No, what we're talking about is the music of the back porches and the delta, the stuff that a white person wouldn't hear on their local radio show. If you were really brave, you might sneak across the tracks into a "coloured persons" bar and listen in. But those people would have been few and far between, with names like Elvis, Ronnie Hawkins, and Jerry Lee Lewis. They incorporated the music they heard in the black churches and clubs into their own country traditions and began "broadcasting" the music to white people.
