stretched narrow horizontal bands of a vibrant, complementary, or completely neutral color across the canvas; others, more complex, incorporate more varied colors into the scheme. Within the multiple horizontal fields of these lush monoliths, brushstrokes also created rhythms and patterns. Green Gift (Fig. 5) features elegant brushstrokes in pink, white, blue and grey alluding to calligraphy, perhaps Dorfman's own or the shapes of Chinese and Japanese written characters. These brushstrokes, together with Dorfman's use of mica-infused paint, create what some have described as "films of iridescent color." They also hint at landscape forms, creating for the viewer a strong allusion to landscapes seen from an Eastern perspective, in bird's-eye view or in the so-called "high distance" mode; in the former mode, the viewer looks into the distance by looking down into the painting, while in the latter mode, he looks up into the painting from bottom to top. They are however really landscapes of the mind which is a highly personal, exquisitely sensitive and poetic way, convey tranquility and enduring time, yet the drama of the colors and the rhythm of the brushstrokes contribute to their emotional intensity.

Following Placemaking Dorfman produced a group of paintings called The Stone Chime Paintings. He had been thinking about something he describes as the "stone chime sensation," the qualities of sound sensation that come from the ceremonial instrument called the stone chime. The concept of the stone chime came to him through a confluence of circumstances, not least of which was his relationship with Han, a Korean woman, also a painter. The development of their relationship inspired this series. The idea of the stone chime relates to the Taoist theory of the uncut block: the image equals the stone. The idea of the uncut block and the sense-image of stone chimes tolling at Confucian shrines keenly affected Dorfman's perceptions and sensations. In the summer of 1982, after his marriage to Han in February, 1984, Dorfman went to Korea to meet his wife's family. His fascination with the East and Eastern thought was thereby renewed and reinvigorated. It was a new beginning.

The painting titled Stone Chime: Green Gift typifies the intensely chromatic paintings within the Stone Chime series (Fig. 6). Dorfman says he always wanted to make a green painting and finally found he could express his thoughts and feelings through that color together with certain spatial configurations. He claims never to have really seen a nonrepresentational green painting but after a visit with his wife-to-be to an exhibition of Korean artifacts and crafts at the Korean Cultural Center in New York, he felt he finally understood the color green. Presumably it was the impact of the emergence of that color on Korean craft objects—as a patronization on Korean lacquer implements—that altered his perception and gave him the inspiration to paint Stone Chime.

Green Gift. He considered that whatever or whoever made it possible for him to make such a green painting, or whatever or whoever inspired it, was a kind of gift to him, consequently the title.

According to Dorfman, at the time he painted it, this painting expressed his own ideal of created beauty. The painting is constructed in three bright, "positive green" sections; the middle and upper sections are divided by two narrow bands of intense orange and violet-blue; the lower field is enhanced with green-painted canvas ribbons depending from the top of the field and covering the large central object of curved abstract shape beneath it which is bolted to a brace in the back of the painting. In the uppermost field blue and white eight-shaped brushstrokes rise up from the bottom of the field, broadening the space they occupy as they expand in numbers and move upward, urgently sweeping through to the right. The brushstrokes in the lower fields are in broader strokes, less urgent and less emphatic. A mysterious, shadowy and amorphous orange shape in a slightly darker green wash emerges in the middle field, also pulling to the right. The bolt of bold orange and blue-violet contrasting colors in the center causes the painted surface to vibrate, and the sense of throbbing color is picked up in the rhythmical movement of the brushstrokes in the upper field.

Dorfman's earlier paintings thus have demonstrated over time a progressive movement toward the abstract expressionism of his recent works. But he has actually created a lyrical abstract expressionism; the formal elements of his paintings, as subject, combine to convey in their abstractness a sense of the grandeur of classical space, the essence of perception, emotional tension, felt experience, desire and a rhythmical, silent music. Even his collages with paint, any of those created from the early 1980's, although much smaller in size than his paintings, are in fact images of monumental impact which project the same lyrical abstract expressionism.

Dorfman, along with other abstract expressionist artists, has been searching for the purity of expression in art. Each painting is the effusion of the moment, the direct and unlettered expression of a personal vision, thought, spontaneous outburst, the immediate projection of the state of the soul. Each painting is meant to be the direct fixation of an emotional inner state of awareness with the beauty of color and form to arouse a stirring in the soul.

As Dorfman himself stated in 1983 and again in 1987: "Whatever goes on in my paintings is simply an extension of whatever else I do or think from day to day, and year to year. The way my art looks, and the feelings it reflects, is not the result of self-conscious decisions, but rather the result of a deeply felt need, and [the] green use of formal means, both the need and the formal
