

Foreword

When the first issue of the Last Post came off the press in Montreal in December of 1969, the stirrings of a new era in Canadian politics were apparent. Nationalist feeling was rising, and major political realignments were taking place. Two themes predominated, and remain today the pivots of political debate in this country: Quebec, and Canada's position as a cultural and economic satellite of the United States. As a new political journal in a period when people began to thirst for fresh information, the Last Post naturally devoted much of its pages throughout that period to those two themes.

While 1969 is a selection of the major articles carried by the Last Post on the Canadian economy since the magazine appeared. (A companion volume, Quebec: A Chronicle 1968-1972, contains the major pieces on the recent turbulent years in Quebec.) Although the articles were written by different authors at different times, the focus of the nationalist debate has had a unity and consistency to the pieces in this book.

The articles have been revised to eliminate awkward time references, repetition and errors. In some cases, such as the account of Joe Green's blindness in the capitalised energy debate of 1970, we have let the piece stand as a historical account; to follow the historical sequence of that energy speculation up to date would require an entire book in itself.

We hope that Corporate Canada will serve as a layman's guide to the history of Canada's economic and political trials. And while it is certainly not economic text, it should serve the student well in a field where current economic writing is often as irrelevant as it is misleading.

Although he doesn't appear in our list of contributors at the end of the book, honorable mention is due Desmond Burgess, the managing editor of the Last Post, who first edited this material and guided it to publication in the magazine. And the Last Post is not only its editors and writers, but the many journalists, trade unionists, researchers, academics
