

Corporate collapse: accounting, regulatory and ethical failure

Frank L. Clarke, Graeme W. Dean and Kyle G. Oliver

Second edition, Cambridge University Press, Melbourne 2003, xxviii and 383pp.

This Volume is the second edition of a work which first appeared in 1997. Although it escapes comment from the authors, it is significant that they have reordered the subsidiary title from the hitherto “regulatory, accounting and ethical failure” to lead with “accounting” failure, appropriately, given that this is the dominant theme, as it was in the first edition.

Moving past the title page, the most substantial change in this new edition is the addition of two chapters dealing with the “new millennium”, extending the previous coverage which finished with the 1980s. The resulting 19 chapters comprise (i) a mixture of essays on various aspects of financial reporting, and (ii) case studies consisting of micro-histories of corporate collapses, although there is considerable overlap between these genres through the essays frequently referring to actual corporate failures and the reiteration of essay themes in the case studies.

Part I, subtitled “accounting in crisis – a farce to be reckoned with” consists of a pair of essays. The first, “chaos in the counting house”, outlines the extent, impact and unexpectedness of corporate failures in Australia, the US and UK. In the following chapter, “creative accounting – mind the GAAP”, the suddenness of these corporate collapses is attributed to misconceived accounting standards which allowed companies to report healthy profits and receive unqualified audit reports at the same time as their real financial positions were deteriorating to the point where failures were inevitable.
