

Quantitative Chemical Analysis

INTRODUCTION

As mentioned in Unit 1 of your lecture, the two main divisions of analytical chemistry are qualitative analysis and quantitative analysis. The nature of the constituents of a given material is determined by the methods of qualitative analysis; the proportions in which these constituents are present are determined by the methods of quantitative analysis. Of the general composition of the material is unknown, a preliminary qualitative examination is usually necessary before a satisfactory quantitative analysis can be made. This is because the method of determining accurately the percentage of a constituent depends to a great extent upon the nature and relative amounts of the other constituents present. (Hamilton, L. Simpson, S. 1984)

The diagram to the right will give you an overview of the specific methods offered in quantitative analytical chemistry. The chemical method specifically volumetric method will be the bulk of this activity. This includes neutralization reaction, precipitation, complexation and redox reaction.

Not only is quantitative analysis of great importance in control laboratories where the purity or other specifications of raw materials and of manufactured products are determined, but its usefulness extends to many other branches of scientific work. In particular, quantitative analysis is an indispensable tool in chemical research.

At the end of this activity therefore, you are expected to:

1. Become familiar with the different terminologies related to quantitative analytical chemistry and volumetric analysis.
2. Identify and apply the principles of titrimetric/volumetric analysis (Neutralization, Precipitation, Complexation and REDOX reaction).
3. Develop skills in analytical procedures related to Volumetric analysis (Neutralization, Precipitation, Complexation and REDOX reaction).

*Note: Videos that will be provided will only serve as a reference, please follow the data in the activity.
