

CORE SKILLS FOR WORK DEVELOPMENTAL FRAMEWORK

WHAT ARE CORE SKILLS FOR WORK?

It's not just technical skills and knowledge that make someone good at their work.

To be effective in any work situation, people need a combination of technical skills, language, literacy and numeracy (LLN) skills and a variety of non-technical skills - sometimes called 'employability' skills, but referred to here as Core Skills for Work. Three types of skills needed for performance in any work environment

A plumber laying pipes, for example, needs the technical skills necessary for this, as well as the appropriate language, literacy and numeracy skills to read plans, take measurements, make calculations, etc. In order to complete the task, he or she also needs non-technical skills such as planning and organising and identifying and solving problems, and skills for working effectively with others.

The Core Skills for Work Developmental Framework (or CSfW) paints a detailed picture of performance in ten non-technical Skill Areas that Australian employers have identified as critical to work performance in the 21st Century.

Core Skills for Work enable people to be more productive. They include the skills people need to understand their work environment, so that they can apply their technical skills more effectively. They include the skills needed to get on with people from a diverse range of backgrounds and to make use of digital technology, as well as planning, decision-making and problem-solving processes that help to get the work done. They also include skills for self-reflecting, self-regulating, making use of different perspectives, innovating and learning – all of which help people to adapt and respond flexibly and creatively to changes in the work environment.
