

tern. The text is at its strongest when drawing lessons from such variation. At other moments one wonders whether order is being imposed upon chaos: the statistical analyses are often unconvincing, given the large number of dependent variables examined, and at times there appears little conclusive data in support of isolated positive findings.

The work is a joint effort of the type becoming increasingly common in psychiatric studies. It shows both the strengths and weaknesses of such a venture. While the reader is left impressed by the range and intensity of the enquiry, he may be disconcerted by a superficial review of his own area of expertise, and bemused by the shifts of focus and of language in discussion.

The dust cover claims "this monograph will provide much material for people interested in depression". Most readers will leave it with a sense of disappointment, and very few are likely to persist with it for long enough to plumb its very considerable depths.

ALAN S. LEE, Consultant Psychiatrist, University Hospital, Nottingham

Diagnosis and Psychopathology (Directions in Psychiatry, Monograph Series 1). Edited by FREDERIC FLACH. London: W. W. Norton. 1988. 236 pp. £19.95, $36.00.

This is the inaugural volume of a series to be edited by a board of distinguished US psychiatrists on Directions in Psychiatry. Since it says on the flyleaf that it builds upon DSM-III, I read on with a question about its suitability for Part I Membership trainees, who are advised that familiarity with DSM-III will be a bonus in discussing their diagnostic formulations.

The early chapters are a bit too apologetic for my liking about the place of categorical diagnosis in psychiatry, without spelling out clearly its uses and limitations. When the editor gets round to this, in a preface to Chapter 3, he says "it is a somewhat valuable tool in clinical research; and it is increasingly necessary to complete third party payment forms and peer review inquiries".

There is a chapter on the meaning of hallucinations, but surprisingly little in the whole book on phenomenology.

If Alex Pokorny's chapter on "DSM-III and affective disorders" had been a model for covering the whole spectrum of psychiatric disorders, this could have been a significant postgraduate textbook. The other chapters, however, include a short one on dementias, pitched at undergraduate level, and a long and confusing one arguing that minimal brain damage is greatly underestimated in adult functional psychiatric disorders. It is odd that a whole chapter is given to the menopause, after agreeing that it has little importance in either diagnosis or psychopathology. After noting that many psychiatrists may never see acute porphyria, we are treated to a whole chapter which ends with the question: "Why does psychotherapy have a beneficial effect in this neuropsychometabolic conglomeration?" Does it?

Perhaps British psychiatrists should pay more attention to the North American work on borderline and other personality disorders, on which there are quite good reviews here. On the other hand, the American authors of a book on psychiatric diagnosis should surely pay more attention to the work of Wing, Kendell, and Cooper, who are not mentioned at all.

PETER F. KENNEDY, Consultant Psychiatrist, Bootham Park Hospital, York

Temperament and Child Psychopathology. By WILLIAM T. GARRISON and FELTON J. EARLE. London: Sage. 1987. 111 pp. £12.00.

This is another excellent book in an excellent series on developmental clinical psychology and psychiatry. Although short, it reviews in great detail the work on temperament, beginning with the work of Thomas & Chess. It points out the rather complicated relationship between temperaments and psychopathology, paralleling the work on personality and adult psychopathology and indeed reminding one at times very much of the debate that has gone on in that particular field. The idea of innate qualities in children, which are shaped by their environmental experiences, is gone into in considerable detail, as is newer work on cognition and emotion in relation to temperament.

The authors are quite cautious in their conclusions, pointing out that temperament, although a useful construct from a clinical point of view, should not be used as describing fixed qualities in the infant without reference to the environment. I can heartily recommend this book to trainees in the field, or to anybody interested in either temperamental development or personality development. The whole series can be recommended to libraries for reference, as the book has an excellent bibliography.

Coping with Loss: The Therapeutic Use of Leave-taking Rituals. Edited by Onno Van der Hart. New York: Irvington. 1988. 206 pp.

This volume covers an important development in the treatment of trauma and bereavement. In just 200 pages, the contributors (from Holland, Norway, and America) outline the theory and applications of a brief strategic treatment model. Trauma and loss are seen to prevent normal functioning and obstruct personal growth,
