

date their rapidly growing populations. The result is not only poverty and widening inequality between the small middle class and the growing urban poor, but growing urban waste disposal problems, squalor and pollution.

Although the data on urban poverty is patchy and scattered for a region which comprises some 18 island countries and territories, Bryant provides quite a comprehensive discussion of a range of general poverty indicators, including demographic factors, incidence of disease, education and literary rates, levels of aid, wages and employment, women's economic participation rates, access to land and housing and so on. She mines a rich and relatively inaccessible source of information - the reports of multi-lateral development assistance agencies. To illustrate some of the issues in more detail, the book includes a very interesting extended case study chapter; one which pulls together data from a number of small studies of urban poverty in Fiji. Finally a variety of responses to urban poverty and environmental degradation are examined, including land management, urban infrastructure, employment creation, and NGO and community-based programmes. The conclusion outlines a range of specific data needs and research requirements which would make it possible to formulate an integrated urban environment management strategy.

The book has a somewhat discontinuous, patchy or 'cobbled together' quality about it. Even so, it brings together a great deal of very interesting information which is clearly signposted, report style. It is recommended reading for anyone interested in development, social change, urbanization and environment in the Pacific islands.

ANALYSING SOCIAL CONFLICT IN SOUTH ASIA

Sekhar Bandopadhyay and Suranjan Das (eds). 1993. Caste and Communal Politics in South Asia Calcutta: K.P. Bagchi (Department of History, University of Calcutta, Monograph 8), 223 pp., Rs.200.

The editors of this volume have the communal violence of the Babri Masjid episode of December 1992 very much in mind when they assert that it is the duty of 'historical scholarship' to take up its 'social responsibility to meet this challenge to India's composite culture.' Yet this book had its genesis somewhat earlier, at a seminar concerned as much with caste as with religious community, sponsored by the post-graduate Department of History, Calcutta University. Most of the papers in the present collection appear to have been ready for publication in mid-1990. They awaited the production of an introductory overview by Professor Barun De, whose formal connections with the Calcutta History Department have been somewhat tenuous of recent years but whose influence on some of the brightest products of that Department - often, but not always, left-wing in inclination - has obviously been considerable. It was probably worth the editors' waiting for Barun De's generally stylishly-written and perceptive piece. It bravely, if not entirely convincingly, asserts that 'the struggles inherent in Religion and Conflict in Modern South Asia William Gould, 2011-12-05 This is one of the first single author

comparisons of different South Asian states around the theme of religious conflict Based on new research and syntheses of the literature on communalism it argues that religious conflict in this region in the modern period was never simply based on sectarian or theological differences or the clash of civilizations Instead the book proposes that the connection between religious radicalism and everyday violence relates to the actual and perceived weaknesses of political and state structures For some religious and ethnic mobilisation has provided a means of protest where representative institutions failed For others it became a method of dealing with an uncertain political and economic future For many it has no concrete or deliberate function but has effectively upheld social stability paternalism and local power in the face of globalisation and the growing aspirations of the region s most underprivileged citizens

An Agrarian History of South Asia David

Ludden,2011-02-17 Originally published in 1999 David Ludden s book offers a comprehensive historical framework for understanding the regional diversity of agrarian South Asia Adopting a long term view of history it treats South Asia not as a single civilization territory but rather as a patchwork of agrarian regions each with their own social cultural and political histories The discussion begins during the first millennium when farming communities displaced pastoral and tribal groups and goes on to consider the development of territoriality from the sixteenth to the nineteenth centuries Subsequent chapters consider the emergence of agrarian capitalism in village societies under the British and demonstrate how economic development in contemporary South Asia continues to reflect the influence of agrarian localism As a comparative synthesis of the literature on agrarian regimes in South Asia the book promises to be a valuable resource for students of agrarian and regional history as well as of comparative world history
