1. Introduction

Both the American Optometric Association (AOA) and the American Academy of Ophthalmology (AAO) have published practice guidelines for the diagnosis and management of open-angle glaucoma. The AOA guideline (published 1995) is titled 'Care of the Patient with Open-Angle Glaucoma' [1] and the AAO guideline is covered in two separate publications, 'Primary Open-Angle Glaucoma' [2] (revised 1996) and 'Primary Open-Angle Glaucoma Suspect' [3] (revised 1995). The purpose of this article is to review and critique the practice guidelines and discuss how they might impact the way in which we manage our patients.

The AOA and AAO guidelines incorporate a similar approach to their outlines. One unique feature of the AAO guideline is that it incorporates a rating system for a particular statement based on the importance to the care process as well as the strength of supporting evidence in the available literature to support the recommendation made. The AOA guideline includes information on the diagnosis and management of two of the more common secondary open-angle glaucomas: pigmentary and pseudoexfoliation.

Both guidelines give brief, paramount demographics of glaucoma. They stress that glaucoma is a bilateral, progressive optic neuropathy and a leading cause of blindness in the elderly and in African Americans. It is estimated that over half of the patients with glaucoma are unaware that they have the disease [4]. There is no current, single test that screens effectively for glaucoma. Tonometry was popularized in the past as a screening mechanism, however, no matter what cut off number is selected, tonometry yields poor sensitivity and specificity [5]. Tonometry used as an isolated test should be abandoned as a screening device. Visual field screening is time consuming, subjective and may not detect damage until approximately one-third of ganglion cell axons are lost [6,7]. Even combining risk factors with quantitative data does not separate patients affected and unaffected with glaucoma. At this time, the most cost effective approach to detect glaucoma is through routine periodic comprehensive eye examination targeted at high risk groups.

2. Risk factors

Risk factors for glaucoma are also covered in both guidelines. Elevated intraocular pressure (IOP) is a strong risk factor for developing glaucoma and one of the few risk factors which can be altered [8]. There is good data to conclude that the higher the level of IOP, the greater the risk and severity of glaucoma damage [9]. In patients with asymmetric IOPs, the eye with the higher IOP usually has the greater amount of
