The second annual NASA/DoD Workshop on Evolvable Hardware (EH-2000), took place on July 13-15, 2000, in Palo Alto, California, USA, sponsored by NASA and DARPA (Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency), and co-hosted by NASA Ames (Information Sciences and Technology Directorate), the JPL (Jet Propulsion Lab) Center for Integrated Space Microsystems (CISM), and the JPL Center for Space Microelectronics Technology (CSMT), and with the cooperation of various other divisions of NASA Ames.

The very fact that these evolvable hardware workshops are now an annual event shows clearly that the field has been established solidly in the U.S., after America's initial four-year delay behind Switzerland.

The Workshop

About 90 people from 11 different countries attended the workshop. (This was down from the 130 who attended the prior workshop in 1999.) The three-day workshop was held fully in plenary session. The invited talks were spread over the three days, but most occurred during the first morning. Once the invited talks concluded, most of which will be highlighted below, the submitted paper talks were divided into the following eight topics, which give an indication of how the EH field is evolving in human terms.

1. Algorithms
2. From Biology to Robotics
3. Evolvability
4. Evolution of Analog and Mixed Signal Circuits
5. Evolution of Digital Functions
6. Reconfiguration Architecture and Devices
