

Chapter Four

Accounting for Branches; Combined Financial Statements

Scope of Chapter

The accounting and reporting for segments of a business enterprise—primarily branches and divisions—are dealt with in this chapter. Although branches of an enterprise are not separate legal entities, they are separate economic and accounting entities whose special features necessitate accounting procedures tailored for those features, such as reciprocal ledger accounts.

BRANCHES AND DIVISIONS

As a business enterprise grows, it may establish one or more branches to market its products over a large territory. The term branch is used to describe a business unit located at some distance from the home office. This unit carries merchandise obtained from the home office, makes sales, approves customers' credit, and makes collections from its customers.

A branch may obtain merchandise solely from the home office, or a portion may be purchased from outside suppliers. The cash receipts of the branch often are deposited in a bank account belonging to the home office; the branch expenses then are paid from an imprest cash fund or a bank account provided by the home office. As the imprest cash fund is depleted, the branch submits a list of cash payments supported by vouchers and receives a check or an electronic or wire transfer from the home office to replenish the fund.

The use of an imprest cash fund gives the home office considerable control over the cash transactions of the branch. However, it is common practice for a large branch to maintain its own bank accounts. The extent of autonomy and responsibility of a branch varies, even among different branches of the same business enterprise.

A segment of a business enterprise also may be operated as a division, which generally has more autonomy than a branch. The accounting procedures for a division not organized as a separate corporation (subsidiary company) are similar to those used for branches. When a business segment is operated as a separate corporation, consolidated financial statements generally are required. Consolidated financial statements are described in
