

Scale Models and Architectural Salesmanship

THE directors of an Eastern bank, in a city that is noted for its beautiful buildings, some time ago decided to build a new bank and office structure of the skyscraper type—a banking home, as well as revenue producing building. Architects were invited to submit drawings, all of which, perhaps, would have been worked out with credit to both the bank and the designers, but it remained for one enterprising salesman representing a firm of architects to set before the board of directors of the bank a model of the structure his firm considered best adapted to the site, to the city and to the needs of the institutions and its prospective tenants. This scale model so well illustrated the idea that the directors had in mind that the decision was reached in short order. This is a case that illustrates the value of the scale model and its usefulness in expressing in miniature how the finished structure will appear. It relieves the builder of the time required to study various drawings and perspectives and as the language of such drawings is vague, always technical and meaningless to many laymen, they frequently fail to win for the architect that confidence in his ability that he desires to have from the very outset of an operation. The recent Architectural Exhibition in Grand Central Palace, New York, demonstrated the value of models, especially in the exhibits devoted to city planning where entire communities were laid out in such tempting fashion as to appeal to the visitors. This same psychological effect, always positive, is the objective of every architect, for it creates desire and desire usually results in attainment on the part of the prospect. The argument may be advanced that the architect's fee does not warrant him in going to the expense of having a model made, but architects, like merchants, have designs for sale and no matter how perfect they may be, or how high a reputation the designer may have in his own circle, he must pattern his course after tried business methods and offer his wares on that basis. It might be recalled here that a very bad architect one time saved a city from the stigma of a very bad monumental building by having a model of his design exhibited where it could be criticized by artists, as well as politicians. That the city might have had a really beautiful monument in the place of the monstrosity several artistically inclined people joined forces and at their own expense had a model made of a design by an architect of no political influence, but of real ability. It is needless to say that their campaign was successful, showing that models are true representatives of design. Reverting to the Architectural Exhibition, it may be recalled that there were many oil paintings, water colors and other plane surface methods of showing designs, as well as photographs of finished work, which were well enough in their way, especially as exhibition displays, but for salesmanship purposes the merit of them might be a question the non-artistic element of our population would immediately raise. A point in illustration is that of a real-estate operator, whose dream of a model suburb, first displayed as a model lay-out, won attention, only to be followed by the query of "why don't you show us a part of this development?" This is exactly what the real estate man did; he erected a house on the landscaped property, occupied it himself and advertised that others would be built along the same general lines of excellence. As his model development began to unfold itself in reality it became necessary to enlarge his holdings in order to provide homes for everyone who wanted to live in his community.

Inquiry develops that models really cost but little more and frequently less than perspectives of the same grade. Inasmuch as the model must illustrate the architect's conception, it should be intrusted to an ar-
