Abstract

The paper tries to unveil English teachers' in-service training needs for contemporary approaches in foreign language teaching. Designed in descriptive model, this research was conducted to 140 English teachers working in Sıirt city. A survey form, developed by the researcher, was used as data collection tool. Descriptive statistics were used for quantitative data and direct citations from participants' opinions are presented. According to the results of the study, more than half of the English teachers hadn't attended any in-service training course held by Ministry of National Education [MoNE]. Also, it was revealed that the majority of the participants didn't have any lesson on contemporary approaches in foreign language teaching during their university education. The frequency of the teachers participating in the research to feel the need to attend an in-service training course on contemporary approaches in foreign language teaching was quite high and their average level of perceived knowledge about contemporary approaches was found to be 1,82 out of 5. It was also found that 75% of the teachers did not find the foreign language education applied in schools contemporary.

Introduction

The production, spread, change and validity loss of information, that's becoming obsolete is so fast. Theories put forward half a century ago were adopted and used for a long time. However, today's theories are rapidly getting out of date, replaced by new applications and approaches (Toptan, 2001). Thus, the changes reflected on the curriculums from goals, content, educational process to evaluation demonstrate that the qualifications required for a teacher should be reviewed (Saiti & Saitis, 2006). Therefore, taking into account one of the well-known commentaries "If we teach today's students as we taught yesterday's, it means that we rob them of tomorrow" (Dewey, 1944, p.167), it can be asserted that the teachers need to be in a constant effort of self-improvement and updating their knowledge about new approaches. Otherwise, as Pepeler, Özbek, Adanır & Kılavuz (2017) suggest, teachers may fall behind their age and an effective and efficient teaching could become hard to achieve.

Although prospective teachers have many theoretical classes throughout their higher education process, they graduate without any practical classes other than teaching practicum class (micro-teaching) (Eratalay & Kartal, 2006).
