Study Guide 2: Radical Behaviorism for ABA Practitioners.

Chapter 3

1. Why are mentalistic explanations of behavior so appealing?

Because they are familiar, they have been taught to us by our culture. It's just the way we've learned to talk. Using such "explanations" requires no adjustment. Our language also requires an agent "I" before every action (i.e., subject-verb construction). It also entails a close in time, or temporally proximate, cause for every action. This kind of mechanical causation is also a common part of our learning experience when we grow up, so it is perhaps no surprise that this way of talking about causes of behavior is also tempting.

2. What is the difference between mechanical and historical causation?

The gist is that under mechanical causation, a behavior caused by something immediately preceding it whereas under historical causation it is the result of an extended history of experiences (a learning history). Mechanical causation invites invented inner causes. Historical causation considers gradual change over time as a function of response-consequence contingencies. The shaping process is a good example of this, but there are many more.

3. What is mentalism? Why is it dualistic?

Inventing inner, usually non-physical causes of behavior. We call it a mentalism when the word "because" is used – for example "because I wanted to." This is important. It is dualistic because mentalisms (as causes) lack physical dimension, and thus there are two dimensions, non-physical and physical.

4. Explain why mentalistic explanations of behavior do not really explain anything.

They invent inner causes that cannot be falsified. That is, evidence can not disprove the assertion that "wanting" made you do it. They also stand in the way of more useful explanations, such as the example of replacing "grumpiness" as a cause of fussiness with intermittent positive reinforcement for the behavior. (Statements like "I wanted to" can be analyzed as verbal behavior, however.)

5. Describe Skinner's three types of inner "causes."

These are all different types of mentalisms: Neural – when we speak about our nerves are on edge as an explanation. Psychic – mind, id, ego as causes. Conceptual – personal abilities or attributes: intelligence, habits. Conceptual is most common, and it is usually
