the 1990s, the "new" social movements have been able to achieve a certain degree of institutionalization, and have been able to influence public policy in a significant way. This is particularly true in the case of the environmental movement, which has been able to establish a strong presence in the public sphere and to influence policy-making at the national and international levels. The environmental movement has been able to achieve this through a combination of factors, including the development of a strong organizational structure, the use of non-violent tactics, and the ability to build alliances with other social movements and political groups.

The first reason is the fact that 90% of the top 1000 firms had a physical location outside their home state and 60 percent had a sales office outside their home state. The other two top reasons are that 77 percent of the firms had a sales office in 10 or more states and 61 percent had a sales office in 20 or more states.

For example, while most studies of the impact of the Internet on the economy have focused on the effects of e-commerce, there is a growing body of research that suggests that the Internet may also be having a significant impact on the labor market. This research suggests that the Internet is creating new jobs and opportunities, while also displacing some existing jobs. The net effect on the labor market is still uncertain, but it is clear that the Internet is having a significant impact on the way we work and live.

For instance, while the 1996 report estimated that the probability of the economy falling into a depression was 10% higher than in 1993, a report released only two months later by the OECD's Policy Committee, in the context of the 1996 report, said that the probability of the economy falling into depression was 10% lower than in 1993. The report also said that the probability of the economy falling into depression was 10% lower than in 1993.
