Copying Technique

The problem of copying, that is making a reproduction of an other body has often, while apparently simple, is actually a most difficult one, because of the great variations in the nature of the original to be reproduced and the varied conditions under which the work is to be accomplished. It is an impossible problem, one in which nearly every photographer comes at some time or the other and one which seems to present more questions than almost any other photographic problem. It is probably because the problem seems so simple that there is a dearth of printed information, but actually such book chapters and paragraphs in general works as deal with the matter seem in English. It has, therefore, seemed to be a worthy task to collect such information as is available on the various problems of copying black and white and colored originals and to produce a book which will give perhaps more of the difficult points which must arise on the field and give sufficient hints to enable any reasonably experienced photographer to obtain successful results.
