WHAT IS SELF ESTEEM?

Self-esteem can be defined as your overall opinion of yourself, your beliefs about your abilities, and your limitations. Self-esteem is shaped by your thoughts, relationships, and experiences, including those related to values, culture, and societal status. Many beliefs you hold about yourself today may reflect messages or treatment you've received from others over time.

Self-esteem can change over time and may transform and stabilize based on the people we have around us and our life experiences. The more variety of situations we face, the more opportunities we have to learn about who we are and who we want to become.

It has been suggested that believing in yourself and accepting yourself for who you are is an important factor in overall success, relationships, and life satisfaction. Self-esteem plays an important role in living a full life.

At times we tend to compare ourselves to others and may feel that we come up lacking. Bringing awareness to what we are grateful for in our own lives can decrease comparison and envy, and increase overall personal satisfaction. Displaying a high level of gratitude can improve your self-esteem by enhancing positive emotions, and may increase feelings of resiliency.

The way that you talk about yourself internally, has a huge impact on your overall self esteem. If you are constantly putting yourself down, judging yourself and using critical language, it can create long term negative beliefs about yourself. These long term negative beliefs may turn into low self esteem. Try finding a few positive affirmations from the list below to help challenge the negative thoughts you may have about yourself. Replace the negative statements with a positive.

- I accept myself for who I am right now
- today is a new day, I am in charge of the present

- I am in full control of my life
- I choose to trust the process
- All I need to succeed is within me
